Regardless of misconceptions which surround the identification of Dada and its spirit, there is consistency in the identification of its typographic innovation. Every viewer of Dada manifestation is struck by the obligation its visual language enforces to compel the eye to see differently, to record linguistic ideograms rather than words, to absorb rhythms of type rather than the familiar linearity of lead which characterized traditional typography, to take note of oddities and directives which t